It’s kind of funny.

It’s funny to visit Rionda’s tower in 2026. It’s funny because of how vastly different the experience is now than it used to be. The tower was built as a functioning water tower, then became an (involuntary) party venue for teenagers in the 1970s, and then simply a myth of ghostly design. If you visit the tower, the man who built it’s dead wife will show up! If you drive around in a circle 3 to 6 times, she will kill you! She who simply married the architect who owned the surrounding farms. She was innocent once, only a fellow immigrant who loved her husband, and simply died of natural causes. She, who now haunts the narrative of a nothing experience. Nothing resides at Rionda’s tower nowadays. Only the promise of what once was. And the memory of Harriet.

I’m a little bit sorry, Harriet.
